Autonomy Quotes:

"The parents still wanted for their child to receive the treatment, and were insistent on signing the assent on his behalf, raising concerns about respecting the child's autonomy versus parental authority."

"This situation presented a dilemma regarding the balance between respecting adolescent confidentiality and addressing parental concerns, especially since the patient, while still a minor, was old enough to have her own privacy concerns."

Justice Quotes:

"Essentially, the ethical question in this scenario is whether it was ethically sound to keep a patient in the hospital even though there were no interventions being performed, and potentially withholding a room from other patients who may "need it more"."

"Here is my ethical dilemma: What to do about parents who overuse medical resources?"

Beneficence Quotes:

"This had me wondering: at what point does it become neglect, and even if this isn't neglect, are there certain conditions or thresholds where we could/should override the mother's autonomy that does not necessarily involve DCP?"

"How do we balance our duty to report potential abuse/neglect cases with the potential harm that it can cause the family?"

Non-Maleficence Quotes:

"We had to decide if it was worth doing a potentially unhelpful test to help the patient/family build rapport/trust with their new psychiatrist."

"Is it the physician's responsibility to dissuade the family from spending significant money on a non-proven and unapproved treatment or is it only the physician's responsibility to dissuade someone if there is known harm?"
